Fun for Your Family:

When Harmonizing With Family At Home Be Sure of Your Words

By MISS ABBIE CONDIT
National Recreation Association.

A Gallup poll of the nation would probably show that most Americans never get beyond the first verse of "The Star-Spangled Banner." It has become almost a national tradition to mumble through the second or third verse and then come out triumphantly with "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

But it's not only the national anthem that we neglect. In recent years all of our singing has suffered from a chronic case of "booklits." We memorize the first few lines and then expect a song sheet or book to carry us safely through to the chorus. And many a time we miss the real singing spirit of a song while hunting frantically for that second verse!

At some time or another every family has gathered around the piano only to find that no two people knew the same songs. Perhaps Father struggled through "Auld Lang Syne" without much support, and Mother was the only one left after the first verse of "The Old Folks at Home." Usually the young folks crane their necks to get a peek at the book, then finally give up and turn on the radio.

There is no better place to harmonize than at home, but it's much more fun if everyone knows the words of a few of the same songs, especially the old favorites. You can make a family game of learning the words and then have a "memorizing bee" to choose the champion verse learner.

And while we're learning these songs, why not think a little about what the words mean. It's too easy to sing about the "perilous fight" and the "ramparts we watch'd" without giving a thought to their significance for us today. The stories of many old songs make fascinating tales, well worth the hearing. Let different members of the family take turns looking up these stories and telling them on "singing" nights. This will help you brush up on a little long-forgotten history and will provide material for some jolly at-home quiz parties.

Many companies publish small, inexpensive booklets containing the always-popular songs which were sung around the family piano generations before the hit-parade was invented. You'll find the words and melodies of such old favorites as "Dixie," "Aunt Dinah's Quilting Party," "Long, Long Ago," "America, the Beautiful," "My Old Kentucky Home," "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," "I've Been Workin' on the Railroad," and "Alouette."

In many cities, towns and rural areas throughout the country, citizens are sponsoring community-wide campaigns to learn these all-American songs so that wherever we are—at home, at club meetings, church programs or community picnics—we can sing them together. And when someone suggests a song fest, we won't have to hunt for a book!

Don't take my WORD for it!
FRANK COLBY
BORN—BORNE
This week's Slip o' the Tongue: "Her sorrows were born in silence." No. Best usage restricts BORN to the meaning of "having been given birth to." Better say: Her sorrows were borne in silence.
Wrong: "He was borned in California." This is a common error. Do not add -ed to born to form a past tense, for born itself is the past participle of the verb "to bear," as also is borne. Better say: He was born in California.
Wrong: "She was born by a mother of Spanish blood." No. When followed by the word "by," the correct form to use is "borne." Therefore, She was borne by a mother of Spanish blood.
Note. Born and borne are pronounced differently. The vowel sound of born is the "aw" as heard in corn, horn, morn. Say: bawrn. The vowel sound of borne is "oe" as in hoe, roe, toe. Say: boern.
What's wrong with this sentence: "I have already drank the water"? Drink is an irregular verb that is conjugated thus: drink, drank, drunk. Drunk is the correct past participle, and one should say: I have already drunk the water. Also, one may properly say: I drank the water a moment ago.

Typohower: Not a bad idea, at that. A Los Angeles newspaper reports that "The Mexican government will establish, at the seaport of Mazatlan, an interment camp for Japanese!"
